

The Brown Study

When my mother and brother were visiting one summer in Copenhagen, my mother had expressed a desire to see an old friend from the past. So one afternoon we drove out to the island of Amager to pay her a visit. My brother and I didn't know this person and we didn't take a particular interest, we were just there to accompany our mother. When we asked her to tell us more about this person, she explained that it was a "woman that she once knew." We didn't inquire further. We rang the doorbell and waited by the intercom. Nothing happened and we were just about to turn around and leave, but then someone finally answered.

"Hello?", a frail, raspy voice asked. When my mother introduced herself, to our surprise, we could hear the old woman bursting into tears. We looked at each other with astonishment whilst the door buzzed. Our curiosity had definitely been aroused. We climbed the stairs. The door was ajar and the woman appeared. She was standing with a walker. She was incredibly thin, very lightweight almost to the point of being transparent. She was still crying.

As my mother stepped inside the apartment, the old woman embraced her and kissed her cheeks. I heard my mother's voice responding in a tone that was full of compassion.

As we entered the apartment we were overcome with a participatory sadness.

It is, of course, always a bit awkward when a stranger cries in front of you, so my brother and I sat down on a couch and tried to avoid looking at the woman too much. I gazed around the living room which was one big anachronism; brown leather furniture, brown wall panel in cheap imitation wood, small porcelain figurines of the cheap kind. "What a relic." I thought to myself as I scanned the room mercilessly. A pungent smell of cigarettes hung in the air. Another detail that transported me back in time. It was like entering the stale atmosphere of a crypt that had remain unopened for a decades. I looked at my brother. We smiled hesitantly at each other and seemed to think the same thing: What a strange place! What a strange friend our mother had!

The woman, still trembling slightly from the shock of our sudden appearance, lit up a cigarette.

"When did we last see each other? It must have been at least twenty years ago?", my mother asked. The woman was unable to talk. She took a shaky puff from the cigarette and nodded in a jolty manner.

Then something happened, which caused me to feel unwell, and which is the cause of why I am writing this text. I realised I had been there before. Sitting on the same couch in the exact same spot. I reexamined the room with my eyes. Yes, I knew this place. My mother had brought me here once before when I was a child. It was on a summer's day in 1987. We had made a stop en-route to the island Bornholm. A flood of images appeared in my mind. Sequences came back to me.

I looked down, I had been laying on this couch. My mother had bought me a Hulk comic and I was dozing off. I remember observing the room from a horizontal angle.

The apartment was full of people. It was a merry time! Everyone was smiling. A young, lean man was carrying beer and snaps to the table. He had blonde hair and a big smile on his face. From his posture and his arms raised up high I could tell that he was having a great time. They were having a big lunch feast. There was an older man. He had a kind face and glasses. He smiled at me. I remember thinking that he really liked my mother when he picked us up in the airport. The table was set and they all sat down. They were singing songs out aloud.

I was whisked back into the present. The woman was explaining her daily routines to my mother: "I am unable to leave the house except for Thursdays, when a taxi comes to pick me up and brings me to the supermarket. The drivers carries me down the stairs. It's hard for me to walk."

We all felt a continued awkwardness by the state of things. I could see a look of sorrow on my mother's face. In an effort to lift the mood a bit my mother mentioned the woman's son:

"I talk to him every now and then. He seems like he's doing very well with his new wife. He told me they moved away?"

The woman nodded quietly. She was looking at the floor. "Yes, he never comes to see me anymore." There was no self-pity in her remark, it was as if she was merely delivering to us a matter-of-fact exposition of her life. "He is rarely in Copenhagen." My mother nodded, searching in vain for something appropriate to say. The woman lit up another cigarette.

We stayed for a while the way you stay with an old relative to give the impression that you are not in a hurry, and in the hope that they will take real comfort in your visit if you just linger five minutes more.

There wasn't really any way to make things better. There wasn't anything we could do, and we knew it.

As we sat there I felt overwhelmed by the transience of time. This brown room had given me a strange perspective, one that is normally not permitted to us. It showed me, in the most vivid way, how time had transpired since my childhood till this moment. It had become to me a sudden and strange parameter for the passing of time.

But this room also revealed to me, on a very concrete level, the unraveling of this woman's life. How quiet the apartment had become. I understood how abandoned she was.

Eventually we excused ourselves. Weighed down by her sadness we walked to the car in silence. "What happened to her husband?", I asked my mother as we were driving back. "He died about 15 years ago. That time we went here when you were a child was the last time I saw him. He cried so much when he dropped us off at the airport."

A couple of years passed. When this text was coming into being I brought up the experience with my mother: "Do you think she still lives there? Do you think her son ever visits her?"

My mother wasn't sure. Ever since our visit my mother would look very burdened every time we discussed the woman. I could tell that my mother was concerned. She told me she had tried to call the son, but his wife had picked up, and she had been very hostile. She was clearly upset that an unknown female friend wished to speak to her husband. My mother told me she became so perplexed from the woman's response that it made her stutter. She never called back.

My mother started investigating the whereabouts of the old woman. The phone number was no longer in operation. She discovered that she had been moved to an elderly home. She wasn't able to figure out which elderly home it was, and since my mother lived far away from Copenhagen and didn't go very often, she let go of the matter. After all we weren't next of kin or anything like that.

We both agreed that it was her son's responsibility to take care of her. We expressed disappointment in him, and this was our way of moving on. Many times however I thought of this woman.

In the last months as I have been contemplating to write this text I've brought it up with my mother who decided again to find out the current state of things.

She finally managed to trace down the old woman. My mother told me: "The son died all of a sudden, and then she followed one month later."

written by Deniz Eroglu